課程目標	This course aims to train students to think critically about the politics of health in general and that of AIDS in particular. Through exploring a wide selection of interdisciplinary texts covering the fields of cultural studies, anthropology, gender/sexuality and critical public health, this course hopes to enable students to develop a critical and historical perspective on how the so-called 'health-enabling' environment was made within the context of Global AIDS

	epidemic and how it can be better remade to meet the challenge of AIDS. It is hoped that through classroom discussions students can cultivate the capacity for self-reflective practices to situate themselves within such an environment, where the stigma attached to AIDS continues to persist around everyday practices of intimacy, pleasure, and self-care.
授課內容	This inter-disciplinary course deals with some of the most pressing political and ethical issues that have emerged in the field of AIDS as the global epidemic enters its third decade. In mapping out the socio-political landscape of AIDS, this course will attend to the materiality of AIDS as enacted by biomedical interventions, research methods and a wide range of social technologies. The interaction of these historically contingent elements and the dynamics it produces enable one to further examine broader questions relating to illness, stigma, clinical practices, bioethics, the rhetoric of human rights and governance as multiple effects of contemporary biopower.
